Christopher Bruhl

“Connecticut & Fairfield County Business Trends”

What will the future of Connecticut look like?

New York City’s population has increased at rates not seen in 50 years. As that growth gets absorbed in the boroughs, Fairfield County and Connecticut have the potential to participate - if we are ready to accept that growth. This is a generational choice for Connecticut. Will the state take on the challenges currently limiting growth – transportation, housing – in order to grow the economy?

And how will our regional market respond to the changes the waves of technology are bringing to our jobs, our workforce and life as we know it?

Christopher Bruhl will explore the region’s assets and challenges in the context of what it means to be an economy within the $1.7 T metro New York economy located within an entirely different political jurisdiction.

Chris Bruhl is the president and chief executive officer of The Business Council of Fairfield County, headquartered in Stamford, Connecticut. The Business Council is one of the largest regional business associations in the United States, nationally known for its approach to building leadership networks and its policy development roles in the areas of transportation, education, and resilience. Mr. Bruhl has been a frequent consultant, writer, and speaker on the economic implications of demographic issues and trends, and the private sector’s role in public policy development.

He is a U.S. Army veteran and holds a BA, in American Civilization, from Brown University, an MBA from New York University’s Stern School of Business, and an MA, in English, from Louisiana State University. He is a resident of Fairfield.
